Gang Involvement Among San Diego County Arrestees

2014 Data from the SANDAG Substance Abuse Monitoring Program

OCTOBER 2015

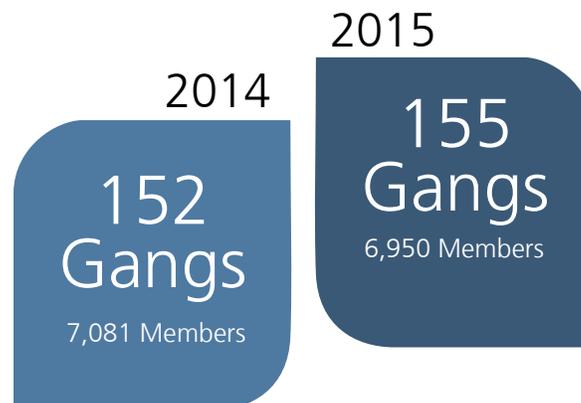

Introduction: The nexus between gangs and crime is well documented in the research. While crime is at record lows, gang activity and membership have remained an ongoing concern for many jurisdictions across the country. Because of this, in 2008, SANDAG added a short addendum to the standard Substance Abuse Monitoring (SAM) interview. This CJ In Brief outlines results of feedback provided by adult and juvenile arrestees in 2014 and completes the series of CJ Bulletins and In Briefs for this project from this most recent calendar year.

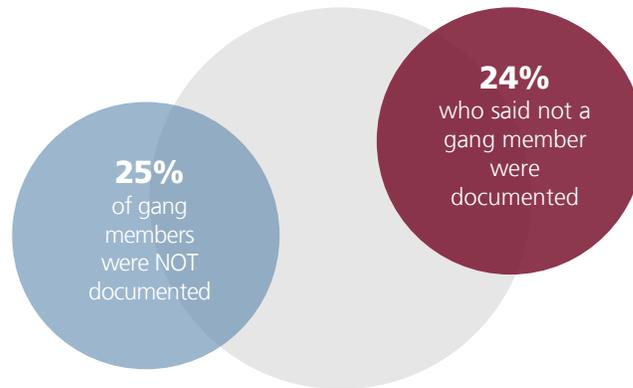

+ One in four adults and almost two-fifths of juveniles interviewed in local detention facilities as part of the SAM Program in 2014 reported some type of current or previous gang membership or association.

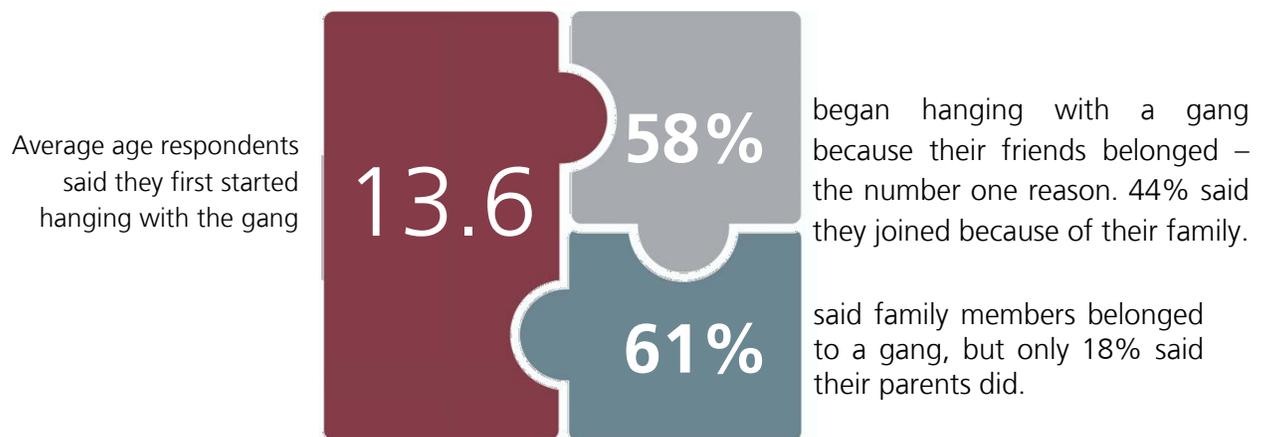

+ There were more gangs, but fewer documented gang members, in the San Diego region in 2015 compared to 2014, according to the San Diego Police Department.

+ One in four arrestees who reported membership said they were NOT documented as gang members by law enforcement; and almost one in four who were not members said they WERE documented.

+ Gang involvement often starts in middle school years and is heavily influenced by peers.

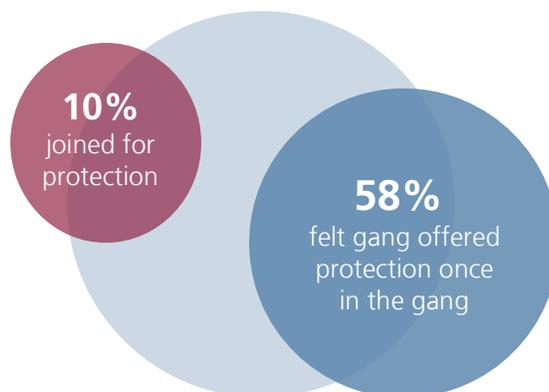

+ While only around one in three gang members/associates said their families didn't care, or were in favor of their gang involvement, more than half felt that their neighborhood or other youth in the community were neutral or positive in regard to it.

30% say family doesn't care, or are in favor of gang involvement.

55% say people in neighborhood don't care, or are in favor of gang involvement.

55% say being a gang member is at least somewhat important to young people in their neighborhood.

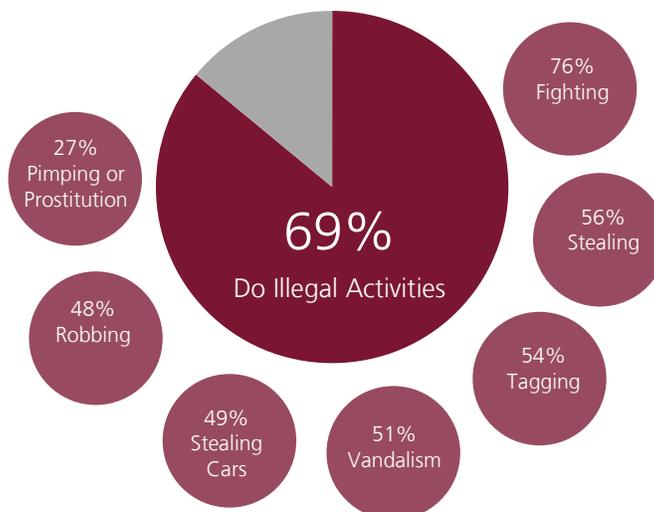

+ Youth may not join a gang initially for protection, but they may perceive they need protection after they do join.

+ More than half of gang members reported carrying a gun and most said they are easy to get.

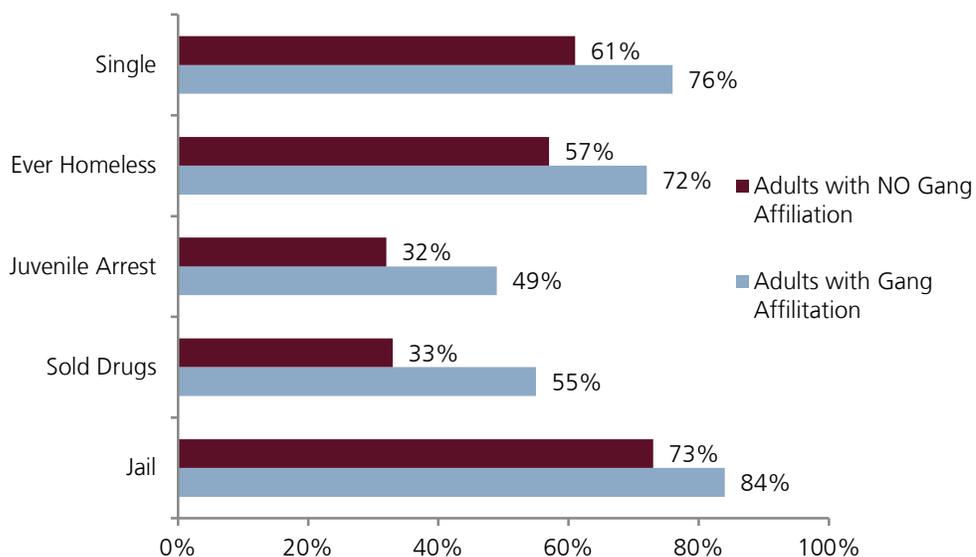

+ 69% of gang members said that they do illegal activities with their gang, which most often includes fighting, stealing, tagging, and vandalism.

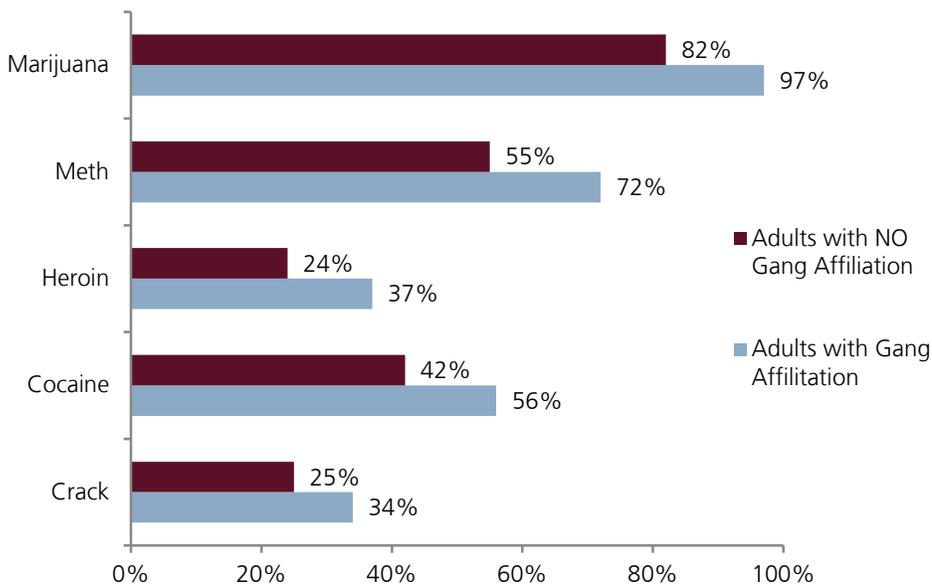

+ 9% of adult arrestees with a gang affiliation reported ever pimping, compared to 3% of those with no affiliation. 11% of juvenile arrestees with a gang affiliation reported ever pimping, compared to 1% with no affiliation.

+ Adult arrestees with a gang affiliation differ significantly from those with no affiliation in some key ways, including being single, having more needs in some areas (e.g., history of homelessness) and more criminal justice contact (e.g., having an arrest as a juvenile, history of drug sales, history of serving time in jail).

+ Adult arrestees with a gang affiliation were also more likely to have substance use issues, including being more likely to have experimented with marijuana, meth, heroin, cocaine, and crack.

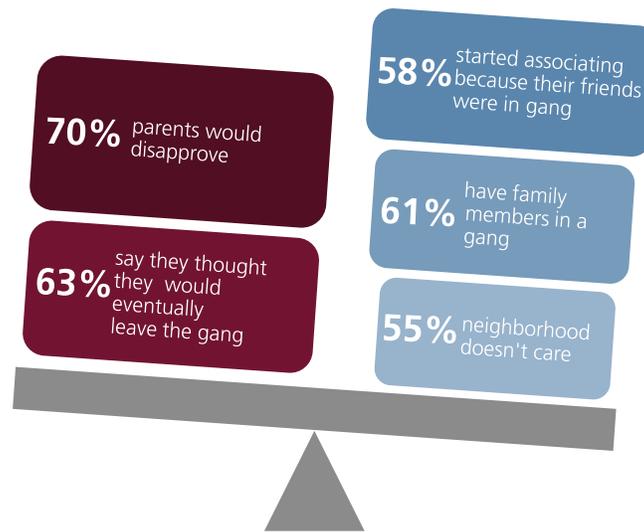

+ Most gang members eventually leave the gang lifestyle. Around one in three (39%) of those still in said they want to get out, and almost two-thirds (63%) said they thought they would leave eventually. Only around one in ten (13%) said they could not leave it if they wanted to.

Valuable Takeaways...

- Gang membership/association can start in middle school and parental disapproval alone may not be enough to counter peer influence. Educational efforts for both youth and parents that start early are important parts of a comprehensive strategy.
- Gang involvement does not last forever, and some current members may be open to leaving this lifestyle. It is important for community systems to examine if opportunities exist to help these individuals transition into a more productive lifestyle. Strategies include recognizing when an individual is ready to leave, helping to remove barriers to success, and supporting these individuals with adult responsibilities.
- According to the gang members/associates interviewed, guns are frequently carried and easy to get. Law enforcement is encouraged to continue to explore ways to get illegal guns off the street and to work with the community to ensure retaliatory violence is avoided as often as possible.

Study Background: In 2014, a total of 772 adults were interviewed as part of SAM and provided a valid urine sample. Of these, 192 (25%) reported ever being a gang member or associate and 97 reported this membership/association within the past five years. An addendum to the SAM interview focusing on gang activities was completed with 77 of these adult arrestees, including 52 males and 25 females. Almost half (46%) of these individuals described themselves as Hispanic, 27 percent as White, and 27 percent Black. The average age of the adults who completed an addendum was 30.7. For the juveniles, around two in five (43%) of the 134 interviewed with a valid urine sample reported gang membership or association and 54 addenda were completed, which included 45 males and 9 females. The ethnic distribution for the juveniles with gang membership/affiliation differed from the adults, with 62 percent describing themselves as Hispanic, 23 percent as Black, and 15 percent as White. Overall, 62 percent reported a current affiliation, 38 percent a former affiliation (with no difference by age group or gender), and 42 percent described themselves as a member and 58 percent as an associate. The average age of the juveniles who completed an addendum was 15.9. As part of the interview, a specific definition of gang affiliation was not given to arrestees, allowing the individuals being interviewed to decide for themselves how they should be categorized. However, interviewers were instructed to include individuals who identified themselves as “skinheads” or “taggers.”

Acknowledgements: This SANDAG CJ In Brief is part of a series of reports highlighting findings from data collected as part of the SAM program. As part of this project, adult and juvenile arrestees are approached within 48 hours of their arrest (and booking) to participate in an interview regarding their drug use and other recent behaviors. This effort would not be possible without the cooperation of the San Diego County Sheriff’s and Probation Departments and the funding support of the California Border Alliance Group, County of San Diego, and SANDAG member agencies.
